Jacob Boswell is an Assistant Professor in the Landscape Architecture section at the Knowlton School of Architecture where he teaches both graduate and undergraduate courses in Landscape Architecture. His research centers on the intersection of infrastructure, ecology, economy and culture.

Much of Boswell’s own creative and academic work attempts to flesh-out the question of infrastructural synthesis as it relates to emerging and traditional landscape technologies, the way in which it reshapes popular expectations and aesthetics of landscape, and how it changes our own processes for design and advocacy.
