Brian Holland is an architect and educator based in Brooklyn, New York. He is the assistant director of Institute-NY, an independent design school for the study of architecture and the built environment in New York City. Brian has more than ten years of experience in practice, both independently and with notable design offices in Los Angeles, Denver, Cairo, and New York City. He has taught design, drawing, and theory at Parsons, University of Pennsylvania, and the American University of Beirut. From 2009–2010 he held the Howard E. LeFevre Fellowship for emerging practitioners at the Ohio State University. His current research explores alternative strategies for the design of infrastructural ecologies, and new forms of engagement with nature in the built environment.